You are here China in transition: consequences for the global economy The Chinese economy has been growing steadily over the past several years. However, the political and economic situation has changed significantly. Having gone through a phase of rapid and, at times, turbulent, growth, now the Chinese economy is transitioning into an era of cautious, steady and relatively flat growth. This is having a significant impact on the world economy, and the policies of the Chinese government are influential in determining the global economic outlook. These developments are changing the role of China in the global economy and, in turn, the roles of countries in that economy. China's political system—an authoritarian communist state—is tied intimately to the government's economic policies and practices. Any factor that interferes with the government's ability to control economic activities, such as outright economic liberalization and an untrammelled market, can undermine the stability of the Chinese economy. This is particularly evident in the transition of the government. For example, the government has increased subsidies for various state-owned enterprises, which allow them to maintain high profits. In turn, these enterprises have a greater ability to influence or otherwise influence the government's policies and practices. In the short term, this can be problematic, for the increase in subsidies has created a budget deficit and undermined support for the government. But in the long term, the subsidies have encouraged private companies to increase their economic activity and contributed to economic growth. The impact of this has not been immediate, but it is an indication that the Chinese government was able to rapidly adjust its economic policies to the transition. This demonstrates a level of political control and social stability that is characteristic of the political system in China. This political stability provides the base for the Chinese economy to take on a stronger role in the global economy. The government of China has significantly increased its borrowing in foreign markets. These sources of foreign-currency funding are being used to finance projects on the Chinese mainland and in other countries, including some projects outside of China. In 2016, China's government-issued, or official, foreign-exchange reserves rose by $163 billion (a number that is larger than the U.S. federal budget deficit). In addition, non-government holdings of foreign currencies in the Chinese economy increased by about $198 billion in the same year. This demonstrates China's ability to borrow on a large scale from the international financial system. What's more,

Display posts from previous Sort by I don't have time to go through all the pages, but looking at the CB World forums I can tell you that most users are fairly satisfied with the Sony cameras right now. The Mini-DV cams have a few distinct advantages that make them better than the DV cameras... They are really user friendly. They are small. They don't require multiple cables. They are very good value for the money (no flip-out LCD, micro SD cards...) If that isn't enough to interest you, then just buy another Sony. It won't cost more than $400. You don't need more than one - they have one for each person in a household. What you need to make your video "really good" is time, patience, and equipment. There are many tutorials on the Internet. It's pretty easy to do - and there are several different ways to do it. Basically, you need a DV-R100, a DV tape, and a tripod. Unfortunately, there's no going back and retrying a "tutorial" later. That's one of the reasons why I posted all that stuff in this thread: because I didn't want to spend a lot of time trying to do something that could have been done much, much more easily. To get some time and patience you can get a loan from a camera store. If you can't get the money together in one shot, then you just have to keep at it. Finally, you'll need to spend the time learning how to do some things: like how to set the camera up on the tripod, how to move the camera around, what to do with the tripod if your images aren't technically perfect, how to get the right exposure, etc. All those sorts of things. You have to learn your camera, learn the "standard" settings and how to use them, and learn how to work the camera. That's why there are tutorials: because you can't just pay someone to do all that hard work for you. You'll probably have to do much of it yourself. But even if you put everything you know in the form of a tutorial, there still are lots of other people who can answer questions and help you along. It's also why I have suggested that you start your own thread. You have to have knowledge of the format and some competence at the format. The
