How do you convince people to test their software in production? We are currently looking for a clean and fresh approach to convince people. A: One of the downsides of the 'perfect software' is that it doesn't really exist. And you are generally destined to find some problems in software, especially if it is complex software like a multi-threaded application or database. The cost of downtime is far more than time spent on testing, so even if you don't have a perfect software product, you will still spend a lot of your time on testing and fixing bugs. You may have various techniques: Feedback from users (test your software by giving it to non-technical people. You may have users who are not familiar with the software, but do use it, just as you do. These users may have various experiences, and these help you to know whether a certain feature is useful to them or not) Test it by using it in production, following the same production steps as those used by your real customers. In production, you'll have: Downtimes of your software, which will be expensive to the client Human errors Bugs in production Doing development on the same platform and data that you are using to keep your data integrity. Develop in such a way that you build in protection against both human error and system design flaws. You need to think through the whole design from all points of view. You may also have a dedicated testing team to further your testing efforts. You should also follow a rigorous development process (e.g. agile development). Rapid feedback makes the development more agile and your software better. A: Make sure
