See step 8 for instructions on how to use the Autocad keygen Why is it that you can't have a political debate about energy policy in this country without it ending up with a great big middle finger in your face? If you want to talk about the politics of energy policy, then you can't just discuss the merits of a per unit price for carbon, you need to talk about emissions targets too. No amount of logic, no amount of statistics, no amount of political argument will deter a determined, slightly deaf, pompous and self-righteous Minister from imposing his own arbitrary emissions reduction targets on the nation. Because reducing emissions should be about the government forcing you to do something, not about it forcing me to do something. I like to talk about energy policy. But when I go into a political argument about energy policy, it always ends with me being told I'm wrong and everyone is wrong except him. I hear it from journalists, I hear it from producers, I hear it from scientists, I hear it from unions, I hear it from vested interests, I hear it from hard-line environmentalists and I hear it from non-partisan parliamentarians. Every single time, there is this same message: "You can't have a discussion about this. You just don't know enough to know what's right." Now, there are occasions when I take that criticism on board, and I do what any other politician in my position would do in that situation: I say: "I'm sorry, I wasn't very smart about this. I'm glad you're explaining it to me because I'll be able to understand it and I'll be able to get on board and I'm sure we can all work together." I will listen and I will listen again, and I will ask questions and I will learn. If there's a problem, I'll be glad to have an honest and open debate about it. But I'm in the business of solving problems. And you can't solve problems unless you have the right to question what they are. I have one favourite, well-documented, political debate about energy policy and climate change. And that is one in which some of the most strident and least informed voices of all are saying: "Oh, you're not serious about your carbon emissions reductions policy." And what they say is, "You're just trying to beat this up and over the top
