Like all challenges, this one can be solved. We need to meet it head on and begin the process of getting to solutions. People have been debating cloud security since the dawn of the internet but it's clear to see that we haven't been debating the right issues for the internet that it exists in today. We need to deal with security issues and we need to do so now. Let's start with some definitions Cloud is defined as a scalable, on-demand computing environment that provides convenient, on-demand access to a shared pool of configurable computing resources. It's used to describe any computing service that automatically configures hardware and/or software resources and that meets the needs of a centralized, rapidly-changing, and dynamic computing environment. Cloud providers offer these services to clients on a pay-as-you-go basis and clients typically pay for services on an on-demand or subscription basis. No one knows how many organizations have been victimized by security breaches in the cloud. It is clear that the average security breach is getting worse. There are an alarming number of news reports of public and private organizations compromising customer data for profit. There are also more than enough examples of government entities being hacked for political purposes. There are also plenty of examples of a failure to take proper security precautions even in organizations that have security experts on staff. Despite the importance of building secure cloud computing environments, many companies still build and maintain a private cloud environment or create entirely new private clouds based on new designs that have yet to be tested for vulnerabilities. All too often we throw caution to the wind and tackle cloud computing the same way we tackle any other line of business. Security has always been important in the cloud because it touches everyone. When you talk about a company compromising customer data or a government entity
