search here In a world where misinformation is the norm, Facebook is becoming the fortress of truth. Every day there are countless news stories published on the internet, some of them extremely inaccurate. Unfortunately, these largely “fake news” stories all too often gain traction because we don’t always see them being debunked, or because they masquerade as genuine articles from mainstream media sources. Yet, even Facebook does not have the answer for the problem of misinformation passing as truth. In fact, the company has been struggling with a problem they simply cannot solve. Facebook recently came under fire after a Chinese businessman stated that he had spent $10 million on an online campaign to deceive people and influence the 2016 US presidential election. Many people believe that this meant that the Chinese government had influenced the presidential race. However, this is not the first time a corporation tried to influence the election. An ex-employee has said that the company tried to get Donald Trump elected by having over-the-top content promoted to the more than 1 billion daily users in order to boost his profile. The problem with misinformation is so pervasive that even Google CEO Sundar Pichai felt the need to offer a correction for “people searching for a near-death experience,” despite being flatly denied by researchers. Likewise, an unnamed employee recently reported that Facebook employees had been manufacturing “misinformation” as truths in order to elevate Trump’s profile and push out the “pro-Kremlin” story line. The problem with misinformation According to a recent Stanford University study, inaccuracy is now the norm on the internet. Over 8,500 news stories are now shared every minute, but over half of them are false. Whether it is making up shocking things about the closest women, or straight-up false allegations about Barack Obama and Nike, the problem with misinformation is real and it is pervasive. Lately, there have been many headlines about fake news, but even the founders of Facebook have struggled to address the fact that misinformation is a real problem. For example, Facebook admitted that they were unable to get out the election interference story when it was mentioned in a message conversation between a top executive and a senator, yet

Q: Setting properties of a widget through web service I've been working on an application that uses a web service to supply property information to a widget. I've been looking through the API and I see that the property values for the XUL widget are hardcoded. I'm wondering if I'm missing something obvious. Is there a way to specify property values for an XUL widget (or otherwise set them)? I'm not sure how to set the properties using javascript, however. Is there any way to do this without using XPCOM? Thank you, A: Looking at the sources in the Mozilla code, I am not sure if there is a way to set a new property in the current session (ie no stored preferences). You could set the XUL property value in the preferences, but the widget doesn't know about that so you would need to call a click() yourself on that preference node. Enrollment in CS Classes soars as industry is booming - guiambros ===== cperkins I'm looking at a potential MS degree. I see a class for the intro in C# (and a few others) and I see lots of java courses. I don't really understand how this could be the solution. Can somebody with experience in the industry explain? Anatomic structure of levator ani muscle for increasing bariatric surgery success. The performance of a bariatric surgery requires that the candidate have the good quality of levator ani muscle (LA) as a framework for the removal of the body. The aim of this study was to determine the anatomic structure of LA and show the depth, length, and width of LA and to determine the relationship between the depth, length, and width and pelvic organ prolapse. The anatomic studies were performed on 25 cadavers. Ultrasonography was performed to determine the lengths and depths of the LA and the widths of the perineum, which are
