Single slip domains become the norm in atomically thin, edge-like, bismuth nanoribbons. Bismuth is an interesting material in terms of mechanical flexibility, band-edge states and structural phase transformations. The low-energy exfoliation of bismuth monolayers that is routinely achieved on standard solid-liquid substrates and the easy formation of bismuth nanoribbons via exfoliation of bulk samples make bismuth an excellent candidate material to be explored for novel electronic structures, where disorder plays a key role. Here we establish that single-domain bismuth nanoribbons with a width close to the limiting nanotube width of 35 Å are most likely formed during exfoliation of the (001) surface orientation of monolayer Bi on liquid substrates. We also present a first-principles analysis of the atomic structure of these nanoribbons and establish a scheme for their ab initio prediction. We demonstrate that, while both the edge and the bulk phase of bismuth
