“Because we had cameras on the player, we could get very specific, high-resolution data on how they move,” said FIFA creative director Alex Popp. “We could take all the things we’ve been doing with Real Player Motion Analysis to a different level. With that data, we could design off-ball interactions much more precisely, and match the player data to the action. “Many of the things you see today are based on computer animations,” he continued. “What we’re doing is using real player data to drive those simulations. It’s very complex, and requires a lot of processing to play back. It’s something we’ve been doing for years with Real Player Motion Analysis, and it’s about time we turned it up and focused it in a new area of our game.” Thus, the animation and physics, which are both AI driven, are all based off of data from live players in-game. For example, moving in and out of a tackle, or running into a wall - all based on the player movement data tracked during the match. The AI is completely reengineered to allow the player animation to seamlessly match the in-game player. Next, the levels of detail on each individual element of the game have been increased to make them feel as realistic as possible. FIFA 21 added an increased level of detail to all of its player avatars and players, but by increasing the scale of the elements on the field, Popp says that Fifa 22 Cracked Accounts has increased it even more. “The main difference is that from a depth and realism point of view, the amount of individual elements we have on the field is higher,” said Popp. “We have more surfaces, more animations, more on-ball actions. And it translates into more attention to details.” It’s all about improving things in small ways, but the result of all that is a complete overhaul of FIFA’s navigation systems. The familiar “autoplay” function has been replaced by a more game-like system that allows players to control the on-screen actions of their teammates and set up plays. The navigation systems, which now have full control over players on the field, is what makes the Real Player Motion Analysis so unique. It’s also a major factor of how Popp believes the gameplay experience could be
