CLL is characterized by the accumulation of functionally impaired, but immunoglobulin-producing cells, that have lost the ability to undergo apoptosis. Unfolding and maintenance of the malignant clone depend on stimulation of the leukemic cells by their microenvironment. The pathophysiology of CLL has been explored with the use of molecular and cellular techniques. Familiar risks include defective DNA repair and immunoglobulin heavy-chain allelic exclusion. Mutations in telomeres, genes encoding TCRs, and genes for various apoptosis effectors have been identified. With regard to the pathogenesis of CLL, our knowledge of B-cell differentiation has advanced to a much deeper level. CLL is viewed as a step in the maturation and/or selection processes that lead to the selection of mature, immortal, and self-renewing B cells. These results have led to the classification of CLL into B-cell types, including centrocytes, centroblasts, and centrocytes, and of the immunoglobulin-bearing cells in CLL into large, small, and mutated cells. CLL appears to arise in two distinct stages. The first is characterized by the production of lymphoid clones lacking significant numbers of cytoplasmic immunoglobulin. The small and large cells that characterize the second stage of CLL apparently emerge from populations of centroblasts with a mature phenotype that have been driven into the cell cycle by a lack of immunoglobulin production. Recent developments in the use of molecular and cellular approaches in CLL have led to the identification of new therapeutic targets and have enhanced our understanding of the disease, thus offering the prospect of improved therapies for CLL in the near future.Q: Redirecting to service page on invalid submit I am trying to implement a validation on my form but for some reason if the submit button is clicked and there is an error I am not redirecting to the proper service page. What's new:

Marble Mage is a single-player role-playing game developed by Australian RPG developer Code Mystics and published by German company Ubiquity Studios in 2006. Nick Heath, the designer of the game, accepted the award for Best Fictional Role Playing Game at both the 2006 Origins Awards and the 2007 British Academy Games Awards. Code Mystics developed Marble Mage due to their experiences with the Dungeons & Dragons: Heroes of Horror expansion. The player character in the game is a mercenary whose guild has been hired to protect a manor house from being ransacked and dissolved in a black mist. In the game, the player guides the mercenary through a haunted manor house accompanied by his personal assistant, or a cat. Gameplay Marble Mage is a single-player role-playing video game, set in a horror-themed fantasy world with pixel-art graphics. The player controls the protagonist, a mercenary, through six quests. These short scenarios are linked by cutscenes. When the player chooses to enter a predefined menu, the game switches to a new quest. Each quest is a circular story arc, starting with an exposition sequence and concluding with a cliffhanger. A bridge is left open at the end of each quest, allowing the player to return to the main story. Landing on a bridge takes the player to the next quest. The player character trades his job as a soldier in a troupe of humans for a contract as a bodyguard. The rougher job requires him to solve an assortment of difficult puzzles and actions, such as stealing a picture from a mirror. Each quest is accompanied by a dialogue option that gives the player one of five courses of action. During quests, the player character is accompanied by a traveler's cat. The traveler's cat can assist the player by using the camera to explore the player character's surroundings. Though the game has traditionally been described as an adventure game, it can be considered more as a horror game with role-playing elements. It features very minimal puzzles and is driven instead of having a fixed set of objectives. The player character starts in Hell and has an optional goal to either save the mortal or break all connection with it. The same actions are carried out by a finite number of characters instead of a huge party. The player character is a powerful warrior. It has 98 skills points to customize its build, 66 artifact points to upgrade its equipment, and 45 skill points to upgrade its abilities. Players can place only two items in
