►◻◻: Flushing changes with git I am working on a project in which there are multiple branches. I am working on the master branch. I checked-in my latest changes after making changes to some files. However, the code is still not committed to the repository. When another developer picks up the project, there is no way for him to see my latest changes as the most recent commit is still not done. Also, if I merge his changes to master, I will have to go back and modify all my files which are changed by his changes. How should I deal with this? A: Normally you will make a change to the master branch and commit. When you are done you push it to the repository, which causes it to show up as a new commit on the master branch. Then you need to merge the other branches from the remote repository. If you are only working with one branch (master), this is done quite simply by merging it with the remote branch. If you are working with a number of different branches, it is common to rebase them onto the master branch first before merging. In general, it is probably a good idea to keep your working branch, for example develop. You are always working from develop and you check in changes from this. When you are working on a feature you branch, and you push your changes to a branch. Finally, you merge in the changes from the remote repository onto the develop branch. Efficacy of the carbon fiber core-sheath gun and rf-driven explosive pulse in ablative treatment of lung carcinoma and normal tissues. Radiation effects in the lungs induced by a 12-microns carbon fiber core-sheath (CFCS) gun and by a 2-kV rf-driven explosive pulse (RFP) were determined by histological and biochemical analyses. Rabbits received 8 Gy of a single-dose abdominal gamma irradiation at a LET of approximately 100 keV/microns and underwent lung irradiation with either the CFCS or the RFP. Effects of the lung irradiation were examined at 24 h and 1 week postirradiation. Histological analyses of inflammatory cell infiltrates and mitotic figures revealed that the CFCS and the RFP had a similar radiation effect. In contrast to the CFCS, which did not produce any induction of the repair enzyme, xanthine oxidase, the RFP significantly increased the levels of xanth

The management of attention-deficit/hyperactivity disorder in adolescence. Attention-deficit/hyperactivity disorder (ADHD) in adolescence is commonly associated with negative consequences for the individual, and presents a major challenge to the health professionals who care for these children and their families. Many children with ADHD go undetected, in part, because of the underdevelopment of screening instruments and low awareness of the condition. Although ADHD frequently responds to treatment in adults, in children, ADHD is often not diagnosed until the onset of adulthood. Perhaps the most significant complication of untreated ADHD is involvement in a car accident. Once ADHD is properly diagnosed, the child with ADHD should be followed by a multidisciplinary team. At present, no single intervention is effective in the treatment of ADHD in adolescence. However, stimulant medication can usually be continued safely and effectively throughout adolescence, and the prescribed medication should usually be increased slowly as the child approaches the later stages of puberty. Behavioral techniques that can be used in conjunction with medication, such as stimulus control and scheduling, can be introduced early in treatment, and they may be particularly useful in maintaining the effectiveness of stimulant medication as the child grows older. Individual attention to the factors that cause stress in the school environment, and the developmental changes that are occurring during puberty, can help to ensure that the school problems of most adolescents with ADHD can be minimized by appropriate intervention. There are many different sources of electricity and heat in the world. In the past, energy has been generated mostly from fossil fuels, nuclear energy, hydro-electricity, wind-power, and solar power. Currently, wind power is the fastest growing source of electrical energy and is also the only renewable source of energy that has zero emission. In general, electricity is generated by converting mechanical energy to electrical energy by means of an electrical generator. The method of converting mechanical energy to electrical energy is commonly referred to as the "electrical generation" process. Currently, electricity is delivered to end users (such as a commercial, residential or other building structure) by power distribution networks. Typical power distribution networks deliver electricity to a substation (or branch office of an electric utility). From the substation, electricity is then delivered through network interconnectors to the end users. Power generation is one of the largest consumers of fossil fuels. Fossil fuels such as coal and oil are typically mined and then transported long distances to power stations (fossil fuel power stations) where they are burned to produce electricity. Fossil fuel power stations can
