In the above exchange between the Prime Minister and the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Prime Minister: asks whether the Chancellor could guarantee a minimum of inflation, reminds the Chancellor that the Chancellor promised an inflation target in the Manifesto, re-iterates the fact that the Chancellor promised an inflation target in the Manifesto, tells the Chancellor that he believes he has mentioned that target six times in Parliament since 2010, tells the Chancellor that he has had to warn that he will have to raise interest rates to fight inflation, asks the Chancellor to confirm that he plans to target 2% inflation in 2017, and asks the Chancellor when he will announce whether inflation will fall above 2% in 2017. I've not seen any of this subtext before. My best guess is that this is a reference to Mr Chancellor's fixed link to his party's position on the right of an eventual Labour government to raise interest rates in order to fight inflation. Is there any other possible source or context that could explain this? A: The context could be as follows. The Conservative Party under the leadership of Theresa May after 2015 election had called for UK to leave the EU under Article 50. As a result, Leave supporters were expecting any Conservative Prime Minister to rule in favour of Brexit. Further, Conservatives were expecting that this government would cut their majority in the next election (in 2019) and that Brexit could be a major vote winner for them. For this reason, they were expecting a tough stance towards the EU. On the other hand, the Labour Party has stated that they wanted to vote against Brexit (so they would not have been eager to make a deal which would make them unpopular with the Leave voters). The Labour Party were also in favour of staying in the EU - this was the main difference between Labour and the Conservatives (and was one of the main reasons why David Cameron (the Conservative Prime Minister from 2010 to 2016) lost the 2015 election to Theresa
