A prison officer has been fired after alleged he pushed a teenager who was having a breakdown to prevent her going on a property rampage in western Sydney. The Sydney Morning Herald has reported that the officer was employed by the NSW Corrective Services to detect whether inmates involved in public disorder were attempting to plan an escape. The officer, who was not named, was allegedly in the exercise yard at Camden's Long Bay jail on Saturday morning, when he allegedly shoved the girl about seven times. After it was done, she was crying and spitting at him before running back into a jail block in the middle of the day, according to inmates. The 17-year-old was later taken to Westmead Children's Hospital, where she was examined. The prisoner was deemed to be a low-risk inmate and was returned to Long Bay. In a statement, the Sydney Morning Herald said the officer's conduct "fell far short of acceptable standards" and he was terminated on Monday. The statement said: "We deeply regret that this incident occurred and the officer's conduct fell short of acceptable standards." In May, Channel 9 News first revealed the NSW prison system was considering introducing metal detectors at all prisons in the state after a series of prisoner-led assaults. The Australian reports that a review by the Office of the Corrective Services Commissioner found the number of assaults in NSW prisons had quadrupled between 2010 and 2015. At least 10 people have been killed after two gunmen opened fire on a mosque in the Democratic Republic of Congo's volatile central Kasai region, officials said Saturday. The deadliest shooting ever in the Kasai region took place shortly after Friday prayers ended. Salim Ntale, who was a deputy spokesman for Kasai's provincial governor, told AFP that "police found at least 10 corpses, including two women, two children, and a person who was shot in the head. They were all killed during Friday prayers." Police recovered seven guns in the attack, Ntale added. One of the gunmen was also killed while the other was shot and captured, Ntale
