I have several animation cips on my timeline and I would like to stop the one that holds the repeated instances of the same event. A: Assuming you want to move back the frame pointer of the animation, I would Create a MovieClip out of the animation. Right click on it to go to frame position and set that to where you want the first frame, this will give you the exact length you want. E.g. if you want to move the animation back 20 frames. Go to frame 20 Click on the Start Editing button Q: How to disable browser back button after successful AJAX call? I am writing a spring/hibernate webapp that uses a lot of ajax calls. I would like to stop anyone pressing the browser back button after a successful ajax call (from the client). So the users can't go back just by pressing the back button. Is there a javascript event that i can hook into and stop the user pressing the back button and instead have them stay on a particular page? A: One possible way is to add hidden form field to every page, which would store unique identifier. If you come back to that form with AJAX and received unique identifier you would know that's a page you want to show. There are some drawbacks to this, especially if there is a lot of form data loaded from that
