Using a one-to-one match engine, the number of defenders, midfielders and attackers in real life can be directly represented in-game. This means not only can players be individually tuned but they'll also adjust to the rest of the team, team shape and even tactics. With the new simplified free kick motion system, players can now be anywhere on the pitch at any time, making it easier than ever to direct and strike a free kick. New features like sprint and dribble attacks make the game quicker to play and more accessible, while new mental attributes like aggression, anticipation and positioning have been added. As in FIFA 19, the new squad management system in FIFA 22 adds intelligent artificial intelligence that allows AI-controlled players to play their heart out for the team on the pitch. The new emotional intelligence system brings attributes to each player based on his personality and history with the club. Finally, two new exhibition modes – FIFA and FIFA Pro Clubs – have been added to the FIFA series. In addition to more than 70 of the world's top clubs, fans can now play as the stars of the clubs from 30 different leagues, including five clubs from the UEFA Champions League. The FIFA and FIFA Pro Clubs modes run as standalone modes and feature full game-play including online and offline tournaments, manager training sessions, single-player season or knockout/cup matches, matches in league and cup with other clubs and much more. In these "cinematic" training sessions, players perform realistic actions in the team setting. In the demo, players use the training tool for set piece shooting, corner kick drills, touchline slalom, and other action. I think the soccer simulators have reached a point where players can train more realistically and actually use their skills in live matches. Of course, as we head into the digital era, FIFA 22 has new modes. Also, a new demo has been released. FIFA 22 comes with the following new features:
