Apoptosis of cardiac myocytes has been found in several forms of heart disease and may be important in determining the response of the heart to injury. The bcl-2 gene has been implicated in control of apoptosis. Cultured rat cardiac myocytes transfected with bcl-2 were studied with flow cytometry and electron microscopy. The role of the bcl-2 protein in control of apoptosis was also studied in cardiomyocytes induced to die by serum withdrawal. Cells were maintained in low serum for 24 hours, followed by serum deprivation for 24 hours, and then analysis of early or late apoptosis. The proportion of non-apoptotic cells was significantly increased in cells transfected with a bcl-2 expression vector when compared with cells transfected with a bcl-2 antisense expression vector or controls.
