Dynamic range improvements for over-sampled successive approximation analog-to-digital converters by means of bipolar analog neurons. The performance of successive approximation analog-to-digital converters (SAA-ADCs) operating at clock rates higher than their critical sampling rate is limited by their inherent nonlinearities. This problem is typically solved using neural networks by mapping the input signal before its conversion into a linear neural network network, such as the perceptron. This approach decreases the required clock rate without increasing the bit resolution. In this paper, we show that the performance of SAA-ADCs can be improved by introducing the analog neurons and mapping the nonlinear input signal into a bipolar neuron network. This method is very simple to implement. Moreover, the bit resolution can be increased without sacrificing linearity and the clock rate can be reduced without losing linearity. In this paper, we demonstrate this new approach with a SAA-ADC operating at a clock rate of 200 MHz.Q: Why do I have to prefix the select methods in my Entity Class? As I understand, the Entity Class handles the data-persistence of any class that is inherited from it. From my understanding in Java, there is no need for any overloads (postfixes/prefixes) if the entity class does not actually store data. So for example, here is my entity class @Entity(name = "subject") public class Subject extends BaseEntity { @Id @GeneratedValue(strategy = GenerationType.IDENTITY) private long id; @NotNull
