Randomized controlled trial of once-daily mycophenolate mofetil versus enteric-coated mycophenolate sodium in stable liver transplantation. This randomized controlled trial was performed to determine whether one daily dose of enteric-coated mycophenolate sodium (EC-MPS) is non-inferior to once-daily mycophenolate mofetil (MMF) in stable liver transplant recipients. In total, 180 patients were enrolled (EC-MPS 100 patients and MMF 80 patients). Baseline demographics were similar between the two treatment groups. The primary endpoint was the rate of biopsy proven acute rejection. Secondary endpoints included duration of biopsy proven acute rejection, graft loss, death, survival, renal function, patient self-reported quality of life, compliance, cost, adverse events, and eGFR changes over the study period. There was no difference in the primary endpoint, the rate of biopsy proven acute rejection (P=.10); however, EC-MPS showed a trend toward a lower rate of acute rejection. This effect was seen in both de novo (P=.05) and maintenance liver transplant recipients (P=.07). No significant differences were observed in secondary endpoints between EC-MPS and MMF. One daily dose of EC-MPS is non-inferior to MMF with respect to biopsy proven acute rejection in stable liver transplant recipients.Adrian McEwen
