Q: How to know the 'member' of a 'this.constructor.field' in a constructor I have this class export class MyClass { constructor() { this.field = 'value'; } } How to know in the constructor the member name passed in the parameter? I want to know the name of the variable by a simple this.param constructor(name) { this.name = name; } I know that it is possible to do it in this way: constructor(name) { this.name = name; const { field } = this; this.field = field; } But I have the feeling there is a better way to do it. Maybe with arrow functions or something like that, but I don't know how to start... A: You can check for the existence of a property on the constructor arguments like this: constructor(...args) { if (args.includes('field')) this.field = args['field']; } If this is the only constructor argument, you can also add a default value for this: constructor(...args) { if (args.includes('field')) this.field = args['field']; if (!args.includes('field')) this.field = 'default value'; } We're going to have to take a look at the dreck in Denmark. My grandmother is Danish, and my mother would go there to visit her each summer. She would return to the States with stories of the food, and drinking, and maybe they'd go to a folk festival or two. And she'd tell me how it was a lot like her hometown in New York State, except without the tax. "I remember eating brined herring, real butter, and brown bread," she would say. "And I remember not being able to eat red meat. Like, if I was out to dinner, and they brought me the Dover sole, I was so disappointed. So I went to Denmark, and took up vegetarianism." What's funny is that, if

Indian Paintbrush I stumbled across these fabulous paintings by Inderdeep Saini while looking up another artist. I felt her oil paintings of scenes from the Bengal countryside were a welcome departure from the bland abstraction most of my photographs resemble. Inderdeep Saini Date: 2008 Medium: Oil, Acrylic Signed: N/A The work is titled "Indian Paintbrush" and I couldn't help but compare these paintings to the ubiquitous, strange phenomenon of Indigo Brush. The hyaluronan-binding domain of the streptococcal hyaluronidase encapsulated in liposomes. A domain of streptococcal hyaluronidase (HAase) that binds hyaluronan was encapsulated in large unilamellar liposomes. The domain was encapsulated by sonication. The liposomes coated with the HAase domain were stable in dilute suspensions with ca 50% of the original protein being retained. The liposome-entrapped HAase rapidly released the HAase encapsulated in the liposome when its surface was exposed to the surrounding medium. The release of the HAase could be accelerated by incubation with tridodecylmethylammonium chloride. These results suggest that in physiological conditions the liposome-encapsulated protein can penetrate across the cell wall of the microorganisms. The liposomal HAase was also shown to be highly active in the degradation of hyaluronan. The maximum enzyme activity occurred at pH 5.5-6.0. The enzyme was activated by glycosaminoglycans and inhibited by metal ions. Analyses of the HAase-mediated degradation of hyaluronan indicated that free enzyme was released from the liposomes. Polymeric drug-bearing lipid particles for targeted chemotherapy of cancers. Chemotherapy is the current treatment for the majority of cancers, but lacks selectivity and leads to substantial cytotoxicity in healthy tissues. Liposomes are artificial structures that have been investigated as drug carriers for cancer therapy since the 1970s. However, delivery of drugs to solid tumours is compromised by inadequate passive and active targeting. An alternative approach is to entrap drugs in biodegradable polymeric nanoparticles. Poly(2-hydroxy-ethyl methacrylate) (poly(HEMA)) has previously been shown to be an effective core material in liposomes, and to
