Staphylococcus aureus is one of the most common opportunistic pathogenic bacteria that cause a wide range of infections. The present study aimed to investigate the antibacterial efficacy of an essential oil mixture (Essential Oil group) against planktonic, biofilm and intracellular S. aureus cells. First, S. aureus was treated with Essential Oil group in order to assess the antibacterial effect. After that, S. aureus was grown in the biofilm form and treated with Essential Oil group. After treatment, the biofilm formation was examined using the crystal violet method. In addition, S. aureus was infected into host cells (RAW 264.7) and the infected cells were treated with Essential Oil group in order to evaluate the antibacterial activity. After that, the infected cells were stained with a fluorescent dye (Hoechst 33258) and observed under the fluorescence microscope in order to verify the effect of Essential Oil group on the intracellular S. aureus cells. Essential Oil group caused significant growth inhibition of S. aureus at a concentration range of 0.5-2% against all strains used in the present study. The present study demonstrated that Essential Oil group caused antibacterial activity against planktonic, biofilm and intracellular S. aureus cells.Q: Loading bootstrap js library before knockout js library This is how I'm currently loading the js libraries in my view ca3bfb1094
