Â· SHA-1 Hash Verification: An encrypted file or folder with a password will not be sent to an end. There is also an option to hash the password for added security. Â·Q: can a non active pointer type be refered to directly as well as indirectly via a pointer? Can I directly refer to a non active pointer as in `x=*a`; or is this a syntax error? I think it is an error but I'm not sure. Any reason to why this would be syntax error? A: Possible reason is, `*a` where `a` is not an pointer and pointer to something like `int/char` or a class might not make any sense(right?) But, if you have a pointer to pointer to `int`, then its quite possible to use. In this case a pointer and its object are indirectly referenced through a pointer. A: All types and objects that contain pointers can be used as pointers themselves. In fact, you can do that without defining a type. For example, this compiles: `int * x = *y;` but this does not: `int x = *y;` The latter expression means "take the address of the object `y` and dereference it to get the value of the object it points to". But as we know, the meaning of dereferencing a pointer does not depend on the type of the pointer (so it does not matter if the pointer is to `int *`, or `int`, or anything else). Conversely, if you write: `int *x = *y;` then what you're doing is something different from what you do if you write: `int *x = y;` Let's see what happens. When you write: `int *x = *y;` there is some "magic" that turns `x` into a pointer to `y` (I'll call it `xyz`), and then you tell `xyz` to dereference its argument and you store the result in `x`. What this means is that you end up with `xyz` containing the address of `y`, and so `x` contains the value of `y`. In contrast, when you write: `int *x = y;` what you're doing is the same thing as if you had written `int *x = *y;` however, `x` and `y` are objects, and you must dereference
