My creative independent puzzle game Chocolate makes you happy is a playful cube-shaped game where you have to collect cookies in the chocolate bar. It's not easy to do. There are some sweets that you have to avoid. You can freely move around. When all the cookies are on the chocolate bar you pass the level. And if you don't get the cookies on the chocolate bar, you pass on the next level. About the Game Chocolate makes you happy 3 is a fun casual puzzle. It has some strategic elements and is a little bit addictive. I made the whole game with a 3D graphics engine. It has no ads, has no IAPs, you don't have to fill your device with games. You just need to pass the levels :) If you like the game, please rate it 5

Weird Wars Rome: Res Romana focuses on the perils of making war in the middle of a civil war. Foes are numerous, and they are all eager to crush the few remaining pockets of Roman Republic. The legions of the late Republic are making their last stand in the countryside, but how do you turn a war of attrition into a decisive victory? This short module has information for two classes and a number of optional rules to help facilitate interesting game play. Overall, the goal of this module is to provide an alternative to playing the Battle of Zama and to give the players a chance to do something besides die. This product was designed and written by Matt Rimler. Additional art for this module was created by Todd Lewis. Game System: The following is a description of the technology used in this product.

of course, was somewhere in the thousands, maybe even in the tens of thousands of dollars. Then again, there was a reason Erwin had risen to the position of Commanding General that had nothing to do with his ability as a leader; it was because he had access to some very, very valuable information. The security protocols had been foolproof. It was Erwin's opinion that without a pre-staged base, no escort, and no high-powered rounds, it would have been a very amusing little challenge, but one that certain parties had decided would be outright amazing if they overcame his defenses. Ciprian was an author, he had a lot invested in being able to leave the security of his compound, and he knew how hard it was to get permission, so he'd sent for all the help he could muster - even between messages, the word spread fast. People gathered in the jungle, strangers to one another, speaking into their own handcom devices. They spied on one another through glasses that were tied together into a single eyepiece. They lifted a booby-trapped tree, ran it back to his camp, and he dismissed his bodyguards to keep potential invaders at bay. Erwin welcomed them, drinking tea and bringing out snacks. He didn't want to be suspicious, and so he gave them the best tea and the best snacks that he could think of - the people who killed his wife and daughter would be sure to try and trick him, and so he had to be thorough. Everybody else, however, turned out to be as trustworthy as Erwin would have hoped. It took four hours to bring the helicopter down. Four ear-splitting hours. When it finally did, the rotors whirring above, he knew to discount anybody whose arrival time differed by more than several minutes. Ciprian showed up exactly on time. The massive crate that followed him out held his typewriter and a few supplies in addition to the money. Erwin led him to his personal helicopter, a safe-looking copter he insisted had a bullet-proof windshield before he would even let him take off. The snow inside was less than five inches deep, but some people found it plausible that the bullets didn't have time to punch through the window. Erwin wasn't kidding about the manual start
