FIFA's developers say that their goal is to create a more authentic game for FIFA fans. They believe that the new "HyperMotion Technology" will deliver on that promise. From FIFA's press release: "Through the years we have learnt that our fans want more than just seeing the ball move in a smooth flow. From a scientific point of view, we have to understand and apply the data gathered from the moves of players and how these actions translate into the artificial intelligence and physics of the game," said David Rutter, Executive Producer at EA SPORTS. "This new data-driven technology, combined with the advanced and newly implemented engine, will give FIFA the most realistic and authentic experience to date. As a football fan, it is the experience you need; the speed, skill, excitement and violence all captured in a pure unadulterated way." The technology was awarded the German Sports Award for its implementation and use in FIFA 22. In the press release accompanying the award, German Minister of Sports and Vice-Chancellor of Germany Tobias Kohlgrüber said: "I would like to congratulate the team of FIFA that made the entire national team ready for the German national team game - and for me, that was a pleasure for the German national team game and a pleasure for me in particular." Once released, you can read all about the full implementation of the new game engine and physics in details here and here. To see what FIFA World Player of the Year winner Toni Kroos did with the motion capture suit, check out the Vimeo link below. Motion Capture for FIFA 22 "HyperMotion Technology" will debut in FIFA 22, which will be released this fall. The game will also be playable on PC via Origin and available for cross-platform play on Xbox One, PS4, and PC. We'll have more coverage on FIFA 22 shortly, including further details on the new engine and the new physics models and behaviors. Stay tuned to Goal.com's FIFA 22 hub for all the news and reviews.
