Pulmonary hypertension in heart transplant recipients: a comparison of diagnosis and treatment with a literature review. Pulmonary hypertension in heart transplant recipients may complicate the post-transplant course and lead to re-transplantation and death. We compared patient demographics, incidence, survival, and associated interventions in a cohort of heart transplant recipients with data extracted from the literature. The impact of acute increase in right ventricular systolic pressure (RVSP) on survival was examined by comparing survival in transplanted versus nontransplanted patients. The incidence of pulmonary hypertension, determined by measuring mean pulmonary artery pressure (mPAP) or pulmonary capillary wedge pressure (PCWP), was similar in the posttransplantation period (65% and 69%, respectively) and in the pretransplantation period (26% and 29%, respectively). Survival was similar among recipients with or without pulmonary hypertension (median follow-up post-transplantation, 5 years; median follow-up pretransplantation, 1.3 years). Risks of death were not different between patients with or without acute increase in RVSP, with or without posttransplantation treatment of pulmonary hypertension. No difference in survival was noted in patients with pulmonary hypertension versus those with no pulmonary hypertension. Our data are similar to the literature in that no difference in survival was seen between patients with pulmonary hypertension versus those without pulmonary hypertension. Moreover, survival in our cohort was similar to that seen in the literature in nontransplanted patients. We also found no survival benefit with posttransplantation treatment of pulmonary hypertension. Therefore, we conclude that further study is needed to determine the feasibility and efficacy of treating patients with pulmonary hypertension early after heart transplantation. his targeted former WSU students as he later admitted to the FBI that he was using his students for sex.
