This answer says that clay bricks aren't waterproof, so one way to reduce the risk of flood damage to a building with clay brick construction is to seal the cracks between the bricks with a waterproofing compound. I'm aware that water intrusion and seepage under the building is a major problem in clay brick construction. In most of the cases I have heard of, this problem has been solved by sealing the brick joints with a waterproofing compound. My question is, would it make sense to add a layer of waterproofing compound (like caulk) between the joints of the clay bricks used to make a building? When we seal the joints of the brick, we seal it against the outside environment, in case of a leak. Would it be much more effective and practical if we seal both the inside and the outside surface of the bricks, i.e. between the cracks and the surface of the clay? A: Moisture penetrates the clay for two reasons: The first is water vapor diffusion (caused by the relative humidity surrounding a brick), and the second is the 6d1f23a050
