One customer of Stowe-based Mastercam Ventures, a unit of Mastercam Inc., uses the milling simulation tool to determine where and how a robot will touch a workpiece. About 12 miles from the shop, the customer sends Mastercam X8-compliant files to Stowe, which then sends them to a Mastercam machine on a cart driven by an arm of a Shurflo machine tool. Meanwhile, in the shop, the machine works on the same file for the same robot using Stowe-provided X8-compliant software. The shop does not expect the arm-mounted machine to be able to do the drilling and threading automatically. A human machinist on the floor drills the pilot hole, and after removing the core, a threading tool takes over. Stowe milling-fabrication programmer Helmar Ruger noted that the system eliminates the need for a human hand to go through each toolpath from a program. For example, a milling program reads the tool path from the robot to the workpiece. The robot selects its own tool and drills a pilot hole. Mastercam sends X8 data to Stowe via the cart, which automatically selects the toolpath for that particular robot. Tortuga has had a talent shortage of post processor programmers as their share of CAM programs has grown. Several customers reported being unable to find qualified programmers to finish post processor jobs. Kormachine was uniquely qualified to do these jobs because of its many years of expertise in designing tools. 5. Change Post Processor Mastercam X5 Crack

Once the model was approved, they imported it into Mastercam X7. Director of Product Marketing Brian Martin noted that Kormachine is a relatively small company, but still manages to use Mastercam in all of its departments. Mastercam X7 has been a life-saver for us as we have begun to populate the plant with machines, they said. Since this is the first revision of Mastercam X7, we really focused on the features we knew customers were asking for, he said. We have added features that are really market driven. We really think we have a feature set that is complimentary to our customers. Martin said the new features are what customers have been asking for. The ability to edit SOLIDWORKS solids and other applicable file types, either directly in Mastercam X7 or through Mastercam Solids, is very big for us. We have been asked repeatedly to turn these types of files into a 3D model. We can take the files and turn them into a 3D model so it can be done in CAM. Manufacturing only recently learned to embrace CAM, so the ability to import and export 3D objects is a step forward in the industry. The ability to post process a part in the plant is a huge benefit. Any time you can do something in-house, you have the opportunity to find problems before they happen, he said. Mastercam X7 is available in three versions, as it was two years ago. The version is the same in all three, but the improvements are extensive. Kormachine is a big customer of Mastercam, so we have made sure the core of the application is the same; that much has stayed the same and we have made it better. So the functionality is really the same, but the look and feel of it has changed. 5ec8ef588b
