Hariri said on Sunday an International Monetary Fund (IMF) mission would arrive in the country in the coming days, according to an official source. The source told Xinhua that the IMF mission will assess the Lebanese economy, strengthen the country's position, finance stability projects and provide technical assistance. Lebanese Prime Minister Saad Hariri A larger mission will be sent to the country in February or March. The mission will be led by IMF Executive Director Christine Lagarde and finance ministers of the fund's member countries, with a number of experts to support them. An IMF delegation was sent to Lebanon in 2011 and 2012 to review the country's economic situation. Lagarde's visit comes after the Lebanese finance minister, Nicolas Shehab, said the government will provide Lebanon's economy with a large portion of its long-term financing needs through the International Monetary Fund. Shehab made the statement on Saturday during an interview with Voice of America, expressing confidence in the performance of the authorities in Lebanon despite the situation in other countries in the region. He added that Lebanon will soon receive financing from the IMF to help the economy to grow. Shehab did not mention, however, whether the IMF mission would be carried out in February or March as the IMF's mission in 2012. Shehab said Lebanon has a strong economic base, noting that the country "can become the financial capital of the region." She said Lebanon has been able to attract investment and has a good potential for growth as the country is "the gateway to the Mediterranean, the gateway to Africa, the gateway to the Arab world. However, Shehab said the government had an "urgent need for money" to finance its current spending and invest in development projects, especially in the economic sectors that have been hampered by a crisis.
