They are connected to the engine by turbo, superchargers, fans and by a shaft. Q: What is the difference between size_t and long unsigned int in C? Can anybody explain with examples and which one is used when, when to specify maximum length of data or stuff that need to be stored in the array? Thank you. A: size_t and long unsigned int are just types, and they're effectively equivalent: typedef unsigned long size_t; The only difference is how the compiler stores the length of a string when using char * or string literals. This has nothing to do with the size of the array. To find out more about the difference between unsigned int and size_t, look in ISO C98/C99 section 6.4.5.3 and 6.7.4.1 and 8.3.4.7. I'd suggest using section 8.3.4.7 unless you're familiar with section 6.4.5.3, as it's easier to understand. A: size_t is a typedef for unsigned long. So, no, they're not equivalent. It depends on how you're allocating the memory, in which case you're using either the str* functions or the malloc* functions. With the latter, you must specify a length with the array. size_t z; long l = 20; char *p = malloc(sizeof *p * l); /*... / z = malloc(l); /... / /... / free(p); /... / /... */ free(z); void malloc(size_t n); A: size_t and long are just types that specify a range of data values that a given function can return in a pointer to void. In particular, the two are not even part of the C standard. The difference between the two is only significant for sizeof and malloc when they work with arrays of values. Instead, C uses a family of functions called str that work with arrays of character strings. The str* functions work differently when you use them as type arguments for char * or const char *. For example, strcpy() can be used as char p = strdup(str); / malloc() is implied */ strncpy(s, str, n); so you have a pointer to n bytes of memory that is also a string. sizeof(char *) can be used to get the size of a pointer in most places where sizeof can be used, but since this family of functions work by storing strings in memory, it is actually better to use a family of functions called memcpy() (in several forms) that has equivalent functionality. In particular, sizeof(char *) is typically much smaller than sizeof(void *) and sizeof(size_t). If you use a string array as an argument to a function, you should pass the length of the string as an integer.
