Dendritic cells (DCs) are a heterogeneous family of highly potent antigenpresenting cells, which have emerged as potential adjuvants for cancer vaccines. However, the majority of recent clinical trials with DC-based therapies have failed to demonstrate significant clinical benefits. Several methodological issues are likely to contribute to this limited efficacy. In this review, the authors summarize the current knowledge about DC biology and explain how DC vaccination can be improved to maximize therapeutic potential. A novel experimental design combining DC vaccination with the blockade of the inhibitory molecule programmed cell death 1 is discussed as a promising approach that can overcome current limitations.
