

The difference between No Man's Sky and Destiny and Titanfall and Battlefield is that the latter two games were created with MMOs and FPSs in mind, and in neither were interesting because they were so uncommon. You really had to play both games, search out the various features, and try to figure out how they were meant to connect. Online multiplayer games are so different from FPSs and MMOs that they rarely connect to the rest of the medium. They're largely divorced from it, especially when it comes to single-player games. World of Warcraft's Orc bloodthirsty leap of progress into a new media is disconcerting. For a single player game to successfully make such a leap is a stunning achievement, and especially given the fact that the game was free to play, not a cash-in. Blizzard regularly updates the core game to add new features, and they have new content packed into expansion packs every three months. There's only so much playing time to be had without making characters crumble, without the player feeling like there's something wrong with them for not playing for longer. For a game to set up expectations of so much playtime is almost unheard of. People have tried to control the Internet in different ways. The Internet is a huge world that is growing with everyone becoming more connected to each other. More and more technology is being used to restrict the Internet. People in China are able to access much more than normal people around the world. The Chinese government is trying to stop people in China from watching or buying movies and TV, even if it was online. They are also trying to block illegal websites and shut down the chatrooms where people talk about the movies and TV shows.
