I understand that some amateur photographers might find it a little rough around the edges. While Lightroom comes with a few filters, these are not enough to work through a mass of RAW files, and the built-in, simple Retouch feature is not something tailored specifically to lighten skin tones or to compensate for exposure, color or saturation. If you are a professional photographer, or someone who seriously wants your photographs to look great, you should seriously consider Adobe Photoshop. As long as you realize that when it comes to image editing, you can optimize, optimize and optimize a bit. As long as you do not want to cast aside the time-saving nice things that Photoshop has to offer, an advanced RAW converter is definitely worth buying. And do not forget the other Adobe tools that would come with it. At the very least, take your time and just experiment on your own. This way, you can find out for yourself which features suit you best from the start and you can avoid pitfalls that lie ahead. I believe it is probably correct to say that although Elements is a free software program, it is also a very powerful one. For the same price every element could be added to a working system. And then the software becomes even more capable. There is also the KDE customization team, which is not to be underestimated.
