Download the free PGP encryption software from here and you'll be able to sign and encrypt emails to and from other users. The receiving email's recipient then needs to do the same and send their reply encrypted with your key to you. You can view the encrypted email by downloading the non-free version of PGP viewer and decrypting it. So make sure you're running the latest versions and have all your apps up to date (especially Mac apps) before deciding to send the data. Encrypting Emails First, you need to download the software. 1. Launch the program and click New. PGP Key and Encryption Method To encrypt an email, you'll need a PGP key or set of keys. You can create an individual key or share one of your existing keys. The latter option allows others to encrypt and decrypt emails with it. PGP Keys and Encryption The software generates a random key in a format you choose. This key is called a subkey or an encryption key. PGP Key Types PGP has a range of key types. Here are a couple of the most common ones: Private keys are used to send and receive messages. They are used individually by each person. PGP Encryption Private keys are used to encrypt emails. They are created by a PGP program and are often used to send messages that other users can decrypt. Email Encryption Types PGP also encrypts the email attachments that you send to other users. PGP User Keys PGP also offers public keys to send messages. This key type is used by anyone to encrypt and decrypt email. Signing and Encryption You can use your own private key or share a public key to sign your outgoing messages. Public keys can
