A woman's body was found at a sewage treatment plant in Berlin on Tuesday, with traces of what police said was a type of drug found at the scene. But the local coroner's office, after examining the deceased, said that the official cause of death has not yet been determined, but that heroin use might have caused the woman's death. What makes the case unusual is that the victim is believed to have died from narcotic poisoning without any of the more serious side effects of the drug, including fatalities or long-term addiction. According to the police, the woman had been in contact with someone who had contacted an internet broker, who had then introduced her to a drug dealer, who had then passed the drugs on to the woman. The Berlin prosecutor's office has opened an investigation into the incident, and said that it will provide the police with information on the background of the victim. "With this investigation we will examine all circumstances, including why she died," a spokeswoman for the federal prosecutor's office told The Local, adding that the cause of death could take up to two weeks to determine. The spokeswoman said that the circumstances suggest that there was no foul play or drug addiction involved, but that the case will be examined to determine if it involves any other suspects. Berlin has been overrun by drugs for many years, and a study in 2013 found that 2,800 Berlin residents had taken some sort of narcotic in the preceding four weeks. By comparison, a Eurobarometer study in 2011 found that just over half of the residents of the Netherlands and France had used drugs in the preceding year, and less
