Once we determine the purchase date of the product, we multiply that by three, and then deduct the average review date from that. If the date length is a half year or greater, we average the review score across the last six months of the review date range. If the product was bought within the last six months, then we use all four of the review's star scores. Finally, we convert it all to percentage, round down to the nearest five, and then multiply by 100 to get the score percentage. This is useful for comparing software between each other or to the average. If we are looking at a three-star review in our average, and a two-star review in two of the other products, we know that the average is a 2.8 star review, but we don't know exactly which product it is. So, we know that it is the least of the three other products because the average isn't as good as it is in that product. We also compare each product to the average. That is, we see the four products and get the average across those, and then we see a product and we see how it differs from the average. We subtract the product score from the average and divide it by the average, and the result is the discrepancy from the average. It's like the difference between a 97 and an 88. Then, if the result is greater than zero, it is larger than the average, and smaller than zero is smaller than the average. For a while, the addition of individual memory cards to cameras forced photographers to ask whether professional-grade digital photography software still made sense. Even Adobe admitted that its long-standing strengths in mapping, photo editing, and design were getting harder to maintain and sell as the print landscape was changing. So late last year, Adobe introduced Absolute Impressions to meet its photography users' needs. It was time for Photoshop to change.
