Arte Exuberante De Desenhar Mulheres Colonnese .The evidence for a cognitive component in depression is abundant but conflicting. One general type of depression is characterized by "psychomotor slowing," and behavioral studies have shown that depressed patients exhibit poor performance on tasks that require speed of response. These tasks include motor tracking, sensory-motor choice reaction tasks, and the spatial working memory component of the Tower of London. The literature on the relationship between depression and psychomotor slowing is contradictory. Some studies have found only mild depression to be associated with psychomotor slowing, while others have found substantial relationships even for mild depression. Studies comparing subgroups of depressed patients have found that those with severe motor retardation are more likely to have a melancholic type of depression, while those with mild retardation are more likely to have a neurotic-reactive type of depression. The proposed study will directly compare the effects of two dose levels (two trials) of fluoxetine (20 mg and 40 mg per day) and placebo on psychomotor performance. One hundred fifteen patients with DSM-III major depression will be recruited. Patients will receive medications for 6 weeks, then be assessed at baseline and at 2, 4, 8, 12, 16, and 20 weeks after medication is initiated. The specific aims of this study are to determine: (1) If patients who are unable to work or to engage in usual social activities due to depressed mood differ in motor performance (measured by reaction time) from those who are able to work or engage in usual social activities, either at baseline or during treatment with medications and placebo. (2) If treatment with 40 mg/day of fluoxetine for 6 weeks is superior to 20 mg/day of fluoxetine for 6 weeks on psychomotor performance. (3) If psychomotor performance is more likely to be improved by treatment with medications in patients with a melancholic subtype of depression than in those with a neurotic-reactive subtype. This project is the first controlled study to directly compare the effects of two dose levels of a selective serotonin reuptake inhibitor on motor performance in major depression. The findings from this study will lead to a better understanding of the nature of the relationship between motor performance and symptoms of depression and may lead to the development of improved treatments.@model IList
