The AI you interact with in the Lightroom imports from your computer and allows you to create all sorts of work-arounds to do the above tasks. You can create "regions," which are regions on the screen, as opposed to a single colored area. Then, the AI analyzes the regions to create a "master zone," which is the area of the image squared up that you will take a picture of. Using this zone, you can take a picture of the image then crop it to the exact location you desire, the quality you desire, and even taking out the background of another image if you wish! You are able to not only position a region but rotate it as well. To explain how, first I'll show you what it looks like when you select a region and no images have been imported. This is what it looks like on the screen. The AI is great because even if you've created a photo editing project, it can still put the project to use in the images you import so that you don't have to do it manually. The AI understands editing and applying projects and will determine whether it's appropriate to use that project on the image before or after it's processed. If it's after, you will see a export function even if you didn't create an export action for the project. In addition to using AI, I know you don't want to wait until the end of the import process to convert your RAW files or organize your images. In Lightroom, you are able to schedule Photoshop Custom Actions from moments after a file is imported. You can choose from an extensive list of functions or create your own Custom Actions.
