Hemocyanin is a ubiquitously distributed respiratory protein found in all metazoan phyla. This highly oxygenated and thermostable protein has been implicated in oxygen transfer, and cell signaling in the free-living, symbiotic and parasitic species of bacteria. The structural organization of hemocyanin is still poorly understood. Here, we report the first crystal structure of Vibrio harveyi, a model organism for a large group of marine bacteria known as the Vibrionaceae, whose paucity of genetic tools have, until now, restricted most of our understanding of this protein to immunological approaches. The crystal structure of V. harveyi hemocyanin reveals that the protein is organized in a tetrameric structure, similar to the organization previously observed in other hemocyanins. Although in V. harveyi hemocyanin the subunit organization is strongly determined by a symmetry mismatch, the biological relevance of the tetramer, either as a function of the large amounts of protein present in the V. harveyi bacterium, or as a structural motif in a range of related bacterial species, remains to be established.
