As with most new releases of Lightroom, the 5.1 update introduced new ways to sort and search your images. Unlike Lightroom 4.3, the user interface is now labeled as “dynamic.” That’s essentially synonymous with a change to a progressive interface, by the way. You can also look up images by keyword, and pre-configure Lightroom to remind you of what the keywords are for your images anytime you start a new project (a term known as “smart” keyword lookup). The new search feature enables you to browse your photos, using type, people, places, or dates. You can use those descriptive tags to quickly search for images that match the ones you’ve already tagged. It’s not a perfect system, and certainly won’t work with every type of image. Still, it’s a great idea, and something I desperately wish the Photoshop mobile apps already had. Meanwhile, several other small new features in Lightroom 5.1 include Smarter Exposure, a software version of the popular Automatic Exposed shot feature, and a button to rotate a photo to another orientation. This is also something the iPad Pro should be able to help with. Virtual clipboard, a work-in-progress feature, is still not available for now. In the meantime, move those images around in your catalog on the iPad by dragging them. I’ve read about usability improvements with the latest update of Photoshop. The performance issues I mentioned seems to have been resolved, though extra RAM would be a definite plus. I do miss the collaborative aspect of the earlier versions, but I don’t mind progressive interfaces.

Due to the very large file size, seconds-long loading times, or lack of compatibility, things like email, instant messaging, web pages and other online features are not in the first places you think would come in handy when working in Photoshop. If you have a large file to work on, you will still need to leave your browser, navigate over to the link below, and download it then open it in Photoshop. e3d0a04c9c
